Introduction

Please note, this document is intended to be viewed as a PDF

Together Liberia is a pilot media development project intended to empower local communicators to share their own stories through training, equipment donations and relationship building.

Together Liberia is comprised of professors and students from 5 US universities with the SI Newhouse School of Public Communications serving as the anchor institution. Other institutions included Duke University, University of North Carolina, University of Oregon and the University of Massachusetts Boston.

Together Liberia created teams to train Liberian students and professionals in storytelling, photography, media ethics, multimedia and web design. Over the course of nearly three months the US team leadership tested different approaches to training, making adjustments throughout the summer, building a knowledge base of “best practices” for future projects while benefiting current participants and trainers.

“What really got me interested is that you get to meet a lot of people, feel the experiences of a lot of people, to listen to their stories and to tell them to the rest of the world.”

– Clarence Nah, Liberian Participant

Participants were trained and produced stories that were published in the local and international media.

Together Liberia is the brainchild of Newhouse School Asst. Professor Ken Harper and Center for Peace, Democracy & Development Executive Director Michael Keating.

Training Overview

- Workshop and embedded “real-world” based training

Training was conducted in four blocks with participants from professional and academic institutions. Participants were trained in one or several areas of communication including storytelling, photography, audio editing and web design. Each participant produced either a multimedia package, a still photo package or increased their web design skill set.

Training was conducted in two primary environments. The first being a traditional workshop setting and the other a “real-world” environment, embedded inside newsrooms.

Choosing participants and trainers can be a tricky matter. Operating in a post-conflict area can be overly stressful for all concerned and choosing those with the proper the skill set, patience and understanding is critical. Partners were chosen from several years of working within media and academic institutions in Liberia. Trainers were chosen based on past professional and personal experiences. Trainings were conducted in small groups with 1:1 or 1:2 participant trainer ratio.

Personal guidance offered participants and trainers a more tailored experience both professionally and personally. Each trainer was given an exit interview and questionnaire before departing Liberia. The trainings were considered highly successful by all involved, and every respondent indicated an interest in being involved in the project in the future. From the feedback, additional thinking should be done around budgeting and organization, but if the approach of the project is changed from external workshops (requiring catering, possible transport etc) to embedding trainers in newsrooms; renting a group house rather than a hotel, and hiring one person to plan the project up to a year in advance (this could be a graduate research assistant) many of these challenges could be avoided.

A small group of like-minded web journalists meet each week to share knowledge in a local internet cafe that they co-own.

Web Training Overview

The West African Submarine Cable System is due to go online in early 2013 in Liberia. For the first time in the nation's history, business and able citizens will have access to true broadband.

To help prepare web designers and developers I trained a small group of dedicated Liberian web journalists in a small internet café. Together we studied modern web design and development including google open source technologies.

Each participant now has access to iLab Liberia, a trusted project partner for further training and internet access at no charge.

In addition we developed four websites for local artists and trained them to maintain their own sites.

$20,000 in donations from individuals and generous support from the Alexia Foundation and the Newhouse School are now in use.

Donation Overview

It is said teaching a man to fish is the key to self-empowerment, however if you take away the fishing pole it serves no one. To answer that need, Together Liberia conducted a communication equipment drive.

Through cornerstone support from the Alexia Foundation for World Peace and Cultural Understanding and the SI Newhouse School for Public Communications we were able to donate over $20,000 worth of new and used digital communication gear. The equipment is now being distributed through a check-out format managed by iLab Liberia, a leading hub for digital training. Project participants are able to checkout equipment for up to two weeks at a time and the equipment is available to us for future trainings.

One central concern of donated equipment is security. It is common for donated equipment be sold after the donors leave the country, often benefiting a single person. iLab Liberia proved to be the ideal recipient of the donated communications gear.

Liberia participants Kindness Nehwon and Clarence Nah work with University of Oregon trainer Prof. Sung Park.

iLab Liberia is the leading institution for digital training and offers Liberian professionals a free location to access the internet. This allows our project partners to check-out the donated communication equipment and then an ideal setting to upload their content for no charge. We developed memorandum of understanding that allows us exclusive access to the equipment upon request for future trainings thus reducing the need for future purchases and transport of training equipment.

One long-form documentary along with several “shorts” and a music video were produced during the project by Newhouse School graduate student Chris Giamo.

The importance of documenting the project was first priority for Chris but the central concept behind Together Liberia has always been to empower people to speak for themselves. When the opportunity to work with local music artists arrived Chris and Duke student Cameron Zohoori met the challenge. One music video was produced for Liberian reggae star Rabbie Nass or “Nasseman.” Several other short documentaries are currently in production.

A Way Forward

- Continue graduate level internships
- Continue building up local web designers
- Continue “shared” model of training with other Universities
- Seek new outside grants
- Expand relationships with the Mass Communication Department at the University of Liberia

I propose to develop a short 3 week internship program with Liberian media institutions that focuses on working in “real world” environments. These internship opportunities would be filled by graduate level multimedia/journalism students with an interest in working outside of the United States.

I have witnessed the lack of impact of traditional media trainings in Liberia, I’ve even led a few myself. They have two main defaults; one, they are often inadequate to speak to the specific, unique needs of individual journalists in a post-conflict nation; and two, they provide an inflexible environment to work in.

View the story “A Lesson in Patience and Reverence” by Newhouse graduate student Andrew Hida on workign with award winning New Democrat photographer Abbas Dulleh.

One of our goals was to establish a better understanding of what makes a productive media training and develop in-depth professional and personal relationships within the Liberian media and universities for future, long-term trainings. I feel that we now have firm footing on the ground a have establish a respect from our project partners that we can build on.
